

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) is considering a proposal that could diminish the protections of the Indiana's Telephone Privacy law.

The FCC is considering preempting state Telephone Privacy laws in favor of adopting one lower national standard. While the legal arguments about preemption are complicated, the practical result could mean I would receive more unwanted telemarketing calls. Should the FCC try to preempt state law, I could receive unwanted calls from some companies that you have previously done business with...credit card companies, phone companies, and anybody else that considers me an "existing customer."

I believe the FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

The Indiana Telephone Privacy law has improved my time at home.

The Indiana Telephone Privacy Law is very effective at preventing unwanted telephone calls. I work shift work and would receive unwanted telephone calls that would disrupt my rest periods. Now, I rarely receive any.

The Indiana law really does a good job keeping pesky telemarketer from bother people. I cannot believe anyone enjoys having telemarketers bother them.

Please do not interfere with our State law's that actually provide beneficial results to us.
